Rationale

Graves is a French appellation for still red and white wines produced in an area west and south of Bordeaux city, running down to Langon, some 31 miles up the left bank of the Garonne River in western France. The Graves region is characterized by its gravel soils ("graves"), after which it is named. Unique among Bordeaux's subregions, Graves is equally respected for both its red wines as for its whites. Often a safe bet for lesser-known names, the Graves region of Bordeaux has it all: good soil, a range of styles, and good value.

A typical Graves rouge is based on the classic Bordeaux grape varieties Cabernet Sauvignon and Merlot, with Cabernet Franc, Carmenère, Malbec (also known as Cot), and Petit Verdot. There are no particular stipulations regarding their proportion here (as is the case in Pessac-Léognan), although Merlot and Cabernet Sauvignon generally dominate. From a style standpoint, the flavor lean to currant (red and black), with soft berries with distinct notes of floral, resin, and spice, all framed by dark chocolate, vanilla pod (if oak aged), and torrefaction. The texture is markedly less 'hard' with a plushness to the tannic structure and firm acidity.

Located in the heart of Graves, Château de Landiras produces classic red Bordeaux. Now retired from the architecture profession, Michel Pélissié has a keen sense for good food and good wine, given his regional Périgord roots. Vineyards are sustainably cultivated (without pesticides or additional chemicals) on predominantly white gravel soils that Graves is known for.
