Rationale

Chablis is a classic and indeed a benchmark for understanding the concept of terroir in French Chardonnay. This variety can be excellent at absorbing — and reflecting — the terroir where it's grown; if it weren't sensitive to terroir, none of the factors that influence the distinct flavors of Chablis would matter.

In Burgundy's Chablis, you have very distinctive soil: Kimmeridgian, a combination of clay and namesake limestone. Chablis is essentially an old seafloor, and its soil is very chalky and minerally, punctuated with fossilized seashells and fragments of marine skeletons. Kimmeridgian soils have a high proportion of clay marl, limestone, and marine fossils, which is why Chardonnay grown in it tends to be revered. The saline, seashell flavor finds its way into the bottle, giving Chablis its distinctive flavor profile.

As a bonus, Chablis does age very well with its bright citrus, sea spray, and mineral notes giving way to toasted nut, honeyed floral, and light marmalade notes with bottle development.

The Dampt family has a long tradition of winemakers. Both Vincent's father, Daniel Dampt, and grandfather, Jean Defaix, own highly regarded estates in Chablis. Vincent grew up in the world of wine and decided to follow the family tradition when he was just 14 by enrolling himself in wine school in Beaune. Vincent's Chablis vineyards are on the left bank of the Serein river, on the famous Kimmeridgian marl; the vines are 40 years old on average and naturally achieve very low yields.
